These paintings are not "images;" rather, they are "functions." A total formal and emotional pitch within each work is the aim. There are general analogies with music, evident to a degree in a number of titles. Both music and dance are invoked through allusions to musical notation and, I hope, kinetic and visceral responses. "Fugue," for example, recalls the musical form, makes reference to architecture, suggests motion (the "flip-flop" of the number bars) while standing perfectly, even rigidly still . . . The "cleanness" of the execution is a kind of mask, disguising the complexity of intention. The final disguise, the one that will give these works whatever lasting merit they may have, is something much like that very old, sometimes maligned, sometimes dishonored, quality once called Beauty.
